Download: Alarm Clock Gadget for Linux Size: 64.1 Kb License: Free This little tool allows you to check your processor usage. It displays the current percentage of idle, i.e. running but not being used, CPU time and the total time used by the CPU over a specified interval. This utility will display the status on the desktop with the interface designed to be aesthetically pleasing. The program has a simple but effective interface which lets you get the information you need as quickly as possible. It's as simple as using a watch. Alarm-Clock uses the hwclock program to set the alarm time by reading the time as an argument from stdin. The UI of the tool displays the set alarm time, alarm time interval, and alarm status. The example program displays the current time, alarm time, alarm time interval and the desired alarm time. The time is set by using the parameters enter_time and interval. The last parameter is the desired alarm time. If the alarm time is set within the interval, the alarm time is set. If it is outside the interval, the alarm time interval is set. If the alarm time is set before the interval has elapsed, the alarm time is set to the interval, and the interval is set to the alarm time. If the alarm time is set after the interval has elapsed
