Forced by the cliff to find a new $109 billion tax extenders package, the Senate majority leader plans to propose ending the cuts to Medicare, known as the sequestration, on Jan. 1, and return to the automatic spending cuts that have been in effect since 2011. "We will not have sequestration in January, we will have a bill where the automatic sequester ends," Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid (D., Nev.) said Tuesday. "It's been there too long, we're going to end it. Because it's working very, very well. It's not working very, very well. We're not thinking about deficit, we're just doing our own thing." Reid and McConnell are still in heated negotiations over the final terms of the bill, and Democrats say that it will be difficult to settle the final details by Wednesday. Republicans are resisting going back to the automatic spending cuts until Congress makes changes to Social Security, and the proposals from Reid and McConnell appear to fall short of that goal. "It's still far too early to conclude that this is going to be the package, the only package that we can come up with," McConnell said Tuesday. If McConnell does not reach an agreement with Reid on Jan. 1, he says he will move a motion to prevent the Senate from acting on the bill. He then said that he would not be able to vote on the bill. "I cannot vote for it because it contains the so-called 'pay-as-you-go' gimmick for Social Security that prohibits me from voting for the bill," McConnell said at the National Press Club. McConnell's previous threats to not allow the Senate to vote on the bill expire at midnight, which is why Reid said Tuesday that the the Senate will push back the date to Jan. 1. However 3da54e8ca3
