Many studies on technologies for 3GPP (3rd Generation Partnership Project), which is a non-TSO (Trusted Service Zone) based standards body and is the project organization responsible for standardization of mobile communication systems, are now being performed. As the next-generation cellular system, improvements have been extensively studied in small cells, in which much smaller base stations are installed in comparison to conventional macro base stations. In addition to the small cells, multi-user cooperative communications (MUCC) is being used to provide a large cell coverage. An example of the MUCC system includes a non-patent literature 1. Further, in the field of LTE (Long Term Evolution), a handover method using a CA (Cooperative Access) method is being standardized by 3GPP. Hereinafter, CA is abbreviated as CoMA. CoMA realizes cooperative communications by enabling different cells to share common radio resources, and the SINR (Signal to Interference plus Noise Ratio) of a terminal using CoMA is improved. Thereby, the improvement in the SINR of the terminal makes it possible to improve cell coverage. Further, a cell that performs CoMA is also called a CoMA cell. Among CoMA cells, in a cell having more users and/or lower SINR, resources are shared with other CoMA cells. In a cell that shares resources with other CoMA cells, the SINR of a terminal in the cell is greatly lowered. For this reason, in a cell that shares resources with other CoMA cells, a response speed of the terminal to a call arrival message and a response speed of the terminal to a call release message deteriorate. Thus, as a method of preventing a response speed to a call arrival message and a response speed to a call release message from deteriorating, it is conceivable to make both of the responses faster by increasing the number of CoMA cells. However, if the number of CoMA cells is increased, the number of base stations to

Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a system and a method for the use of an implanting machine to implant an intervertebral disc nucleus pulposus prosthesis, and a delivery system for implanting the nucleus pulposus prosthesis. 2. Description of the Related Art Intervertebral disc interdiscal injections are commonly practiced to replace damaged or diseased discs to alleviate patient pain and to treat trauma. In performing these interdiscal injections, the annulus fibrosus is removed so as to expose the nucleus pulposus. A needle may be inserted through the annulus to inject the intervertebral disc nucleus pulposus prosthesis. There are a few drawbacks to the prior art methods of implanting the nucleus pulposus prosthesis. For example, in many cases more than one insertion is required to reach the nucleus pulposus at the end of the injection needle. This is especially true when it is desired to inject the nucleus pulposus prosthesis in the spinal canal, since the nucleus pulposus is located between two opposing vertebrae.[arXiv:hep-th/0401028\].
