We study the local curvature scaling in complex networks using the local metric of the network's adjacency matrix. We find that if the network is scale-free, the local curvature fluctuates around a universal average. In contrast, if the network is not scale-free, the local curvature has a broad distribution, which contains a small amount of very large curvature values. These observations are valid for both regular and complex networks, including small-world and scale-free networks with power-law degree distribution. As the number af5dca3d97
